Archeology of fire

Life, Death, Cults: a constant presence

Research and excavations

Monographic theme

The presence of fire and its importance in everyday life, in funerary rituals and in religious ideology have been the subject of many studies and much research; however, the related activities, beliefs and myths are not observable anymore and have to be reconstructed interpreting material remains survived until now; the process is very complex and not without risks because many of this archaeological sources got to us modified and their informative capability has been sensibly reduced; moreover we lost the interpretative codes and to understand antiquity modern interpretative categories are utilised, which are often inappropriate and misleading.

Is it possible to distinguish a domestic hearth from a ritual fire, material residue of an action involving animal sacrifice to worship a deity? Or from the remains of a communal banquet in honour of the dead or the ancestors? In every case it will be possible to find charcoal, ash, animal bones and charred seeds. A few tools are available for a correct interpretation such as: more recent comparanda, including religious activities and ceremonies described by written sources; ethnoarchaeology, through the observation of contexts that produce material remains similar to those ones in study; experimental archaeology. However, the most accurate analysis is that one of the archaeological context and its comparanda. The probabilities of a more accurate interpretation increase with the number of contexts studied and, therefore, available for comparison.

This conference aims to analyse different types of fire features, the typology of materials found in the same context, the type of contexts and their comparanda, to create an ample collection of case studies. The aim of this exercise is to foster the design of hypotheses based on the largest possible number of secure data.

For this reason, every case study presented shall describe the finds, including them in a general reference category based on the type of context, and finally, when necessary to formulate interpretative hypotheses, recourse can be made to later literary tradition, ethnoarchaeology and experimental archaeology.

During the Conference the following themes will be considered:

- Topic 1 – Fire in household setting: hearths, ovens, accidental fires;
- Topic 2 – Fire in ritual context: hearths, layers altered by fire, evidence of ritual burning on artefacts and/or ecofacts;
- Topic 3 – Fire in funerary context:  ustrina, cremation rites, rituals involving the use of soils containing cremated human remains;
- Topic 4 – Fire in workshop setting: ovens, kilns, production techniques.

When submitting your paper, please, specify for which of the above four topics you wish to be considered.
